The United States of America —
Federation of States

Since the 1960's we have known and it has been proven mathematically that time — as we think of it — does not exist; this has only been confirmed and reaffirmed by quantum physics.

The only “time” that exists is this moment we call “now” and now is a spatial phenomenon, also called “the bridge” or in Rome, “the Pontiff”.

Now you know the deeper arcane meaning of the former Office of the Roman Pontiff.

Recently, there is a great deal of discussion about Lunar versus Solar calendars and systems of time keeping, with advocates passionately fighting over Mayan, Gregorian, Julian, Greenland, and so on.

These are cataloguing systems that track events. The concept of time is actually the spatial change in “now” that allows events to happen.

Let's be clear. Nobody really knows what time it is, because time does not exist. All calendars are arbitrary conceptual frameworks used to track events.

In a sane world, we'd admit that it is handy to know and be able to prove a sequence of events in terms of before and after- and that's really all any of the calendars or time-keeping systems do.

Having a unified time standard makes it easier to plan, meet, and do business, because then we can determine with some ease — not entirely — when an event happened or is happening in another place.

As hard as all the governments have struggled to manage just this one little convenience, we have ample proof that the majority of people on this planet don't understand time zones, and large numbers of people are suddenly turning their attention to the issue of time and time-keeping.

Some people are unhinged and in a personal identity crisis because they realized that they have a different birthday depending on whether you consult the Gregorian or Julian Calendar. They smell a rat, but they can't quite put their finger on it.

Consider what happened when the British adopted the Gregorian Calendar and passed The Calendar (New Style) Act of 1750.

There were riots in the streets because people believed that the government had somehow stolen eleven days of their lives or placed them in a new fictitious world.

Apparently, it did not occur to them that the “old” timeline was fictitious, too.

Following the English Civil War, the Powers That Be in Rome simply erased 7,128 years of what we call history, in order to “correct a discrepancy” which amounted to dropping the Hebrew Calendar and the earlier Persian Calendar from “the scope of history”?

Then they added 1,100 years worth of history back into their falsified accounting scheme, called this “the Dark Ages”, and then deleted it again.

There was always a different arcane meaning to the “Dark Ages” above and beyond what we are taught or left to assume as schoolchildren. In Roman parlance, the “Dark Ages” are dark because they are hidden — deliberately; in English it implies that we don’t know much about them.

This is a pattern. The Roman system hides the cheese; the English system remarks upon the fact that the cheese is hidden. The people remain ignorant, yet the Perpetrators claim that they have given full disclosure, because they remarked upon the hidden cheese.

Why were the Dark Ages hidden? To hide the existence of entire civilizations that preceded Rome and made Rome look like a backwoods militia.

They wanted us to believe in the “glories of Rome” and remain unaware of the glories of India, Africa, Russia and China. They wanted to inbreed a myopic myth of European superiority, centered on Rome and the Roman Catholic Church.

They cut off common access to all the rest of the history that earlier catalogues of events retained, similar to the way they manipulate the evening news, or impose internet censorship and AI information control by automatically attaching an AI middleman to every search you make.

From 1700 onward, they decided, the world would depend on the history of Rome and the Roman Empire as the basis of the accepted Calendar and time-keeping model.

There were darker, and more pragmatic reasons for this shuttering and blinding. Wiping away the calendars meant wiping away the events these calendars catalogued, too. By erasing the dates, they erased the names. And the treaties. And the ownership interests.

This instant erasure of “time” actually served to erase events, prior civilizations, prior ownerships— everything and everyone that the Roman Curia deemed to be inconvenient or too expensive or embarrassing.

India remembered the First Jesus, so their culture and history had to be discredited and Sanskrit had to be deemed indecipherable. India remembered the Second Jesus, too, and that was even worse.

India’s knowledge presented a direct threat to the Church’s monopoly on Jesus, so India had to be denigrated and its culture mocked and its ancient writings bypassed. The calendar of the Mahabharata had to disappear.

Like everything else hidden in the “Dark Ages”, it became relegated to the realm of myth and story and legend.

The Ancient History of Africa had already been largely silenced and destroyed, but the erasure of the calendars — not of “time” but of events — neatly aided that ongoing process. Egypt was difficult because of the monuments, but could otherwise be passed over, thanks to the Saharan sands covering most of North Africa like a blanket hiding jewels.

Money and goods and credit for innovations owed to China was materially inconvenient, so — poof!

Russia caused the most urgency and bile behind the move to erase the history of events by erasing the system cataloguing them.

Rome owed Tartaria money — lots of it — so when the Great Earthquake came and shook the Earth as it had never been shaken before, the superstitious Romans not only claimed the fulfillment of Bible prophecy, but assumed God’s judgement against Tartaria.

They took their chance to wipe the calendar and erase Tartaria and their own debts to Tartaria.

It isn’t hard to understand how this works. We commonly do the same thing ourselves, when we cancel appointments and vacation plans and return theater tickets and reminders to pay the light bill — and do what? Clear our calendar.

A great deal of the rest of what remains of history and the calendars used to catalogue events, is the history of Rome avoiding its debts and conniving means to retain control, aided and abetted by their faithful sidekicks, cronies, and running dogs, the European Monarchs and the European “National” Corporations, like the UNITED KINGDOM, INC. and FRANCE, INC. and Germany, Inc.....

Having sputtered awake, there are Legal Eagles all over the planet shaking their heads and muttering, “If the date is false, and the date is included on every contract, Will, sale, law, code, statute.... the whole document is voided by that one false element....”

They can’t really claim “fraud” concerning the dates and the dating system, because the calendar system as a cataloguing system to keep track of events has been fully disclosed, but they can claim that, materially, the date is false.

Why? Because time doesn’t exist.

And they can claim fraud with respect to the greater issue — the hidden erasure of entire millennia, entire cultures.

Part of what they have tried to obscure with their “Dark Ages” is the relationship of the French Armoricans with America, meaning the Continents, both North and South.

Armorica is an Ancient French Celtic Kingdom (still has a flag and national ethnicity, too, its recognizable dialect, its traditional dress....) located on the far western edge of France, right across the English Channel from the Great Southern Ports. The Armoricans are extremely intrepid navigators, sailors, and traders and from their home bases in Normandy and Brittany, they ventured westward, ever westward.

As you can now literally see, the Dominion of Armorica includes Brittany and Normandy, Maine and Anjou. It also has a strangely familiar flag in the modern era, and again, you see the red, white, and blue, symbolizing body, soul, and mind as well as land, air, and water, which is the living kingdom of every man.
