The United States of America —
Federation of States

Yesterday we explained the military history— the relatively recent military history— of that part of North America known as The United States.

Once the American Government (1776-1783) secured victory over the British Empire, progress Westward was via a Territorial Government process set forth in the Northwest Ordinance, with the British Territorial Government taking the lead in exploration and initial settlement as a result of treaty provisions mandating this arrangement.

The Native Nations that were not conquered in the French and Indian War were successively met in battle with the British Territorial Government operating as the United States of America, Incorporated, a rogue service vendor of the actual American Government.

Our American Government has been at peace since 1814 and flies the peacetime flag.

Anytime that what appears to be the American war flag has been seen between 1814 and today, it was a Title IV flag being flown by the United States Government. Not the American Government.

So, the Native Nations thought they were fighting us, when in fact they were fighting British Territorial Mercenary forces.

While we are cleaning up these “mistaken identity” issues, let us also clear up the genesis of the name “America” associated with our country and two continents, both North and South America.

The name “America” comes from “Armorica” a Celtic Kingdom of far western France that has more generally come to be known as part of “Normandy”.

See the map and flag photo attached.

Armorica has played a central part in the Norman Conquest of Britain and the trade and colonization of North and South America, but as Britain desperately wanted to keep this role hidden, they have spread a popular tale about the name, “America” coming from Amerigo Vespucci, an Italian mapmaker —and mum has been the word about the ancient and honorable Kingdom of Armorica.

Armorica is an actual and factual historical Celtic Kingdom and it should be self-evident that this is the origin of the name “America”.

British attempts to avoid French claims superseding their own property claims in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, as well as North and South America, notwithstanding, the claims are valid and they exist. They are the basis for the Norman Conquest and the American Revolution, too.

The Brits don't want to admit the Norman Conquest, either, but even long prior to that, if anyone was paying attention, it should also be obvious that the very name "Britain" is a transliteration of "Breton".

The French Celts have an ancient and honorable claim to Britain and all British property interests, which they enforced during the Norman Conquest and the American Revolution. This is why Marquis de Lafayette showed up and spent the equivalent of millions of dollars in support of the Colonists.

The continents and the countries that bear the name "America" are named after "Armorica" one of the ancient Celtic Kingdoms.

So, whether you look at it in terms of military conquest by the Americans, or conquest by the British Empire, the Brits are owned by the French Celts anyway, and James Clinton Belcher, "the" Belle Cher, is the hereditary leader of the French Celts — the Armoricans and thus, the Americans, too.

This is why the Belcher family coat of arms is self-evidently the foundation of the Great Seal of this country.

Let us all dispense with the lies and avoidance and childish misinterpretations of fact and history, and simply admit what is true: the French Celts have owned "Britain" since the Dark Ages; they owned it again during the Norman Conquest, and on a different continent, they owned it during the American Revolution.

It's our Kingdom's name attached to this country. It's our Kingdom's name attached to two world continents. It's our right by military conquest to own Britain (Breton) and it's our name, "Armorica" that is the basis of "America".

It's our Great Seal that stands among the nations.

All this other craziness by the Brits trying to chisel and defraud everyone is not something we condoned, and all their efforts to obscure the actual history notwithstanding — Armorica exists, it's one of our ancient Kingdoms, and we claim it and all that exists in its name. We have welcomed the Native Nations as brothers and we have Blood Treaties going back centuries that we honor.

To be family should always be sufficient, and we believe it is.
